Judiciary is one of the three prongs of the state governance, the other two being the legislature and the executive. For the smooth and effective working of any county, a sufficient separation of power needs to be maintained between the three branches, where collaboration is always preferred over control or cohesion. But Pakistan, a country with a crisis of governance, has always suffered from a chronic imbalance between the state institutions. One such instance is that of impediments to judicial autonomy by various political and non-political forces. It wouldn't be wrong to say the judiciary has, for most of Pakistan's history, juggled between the two extremes of 'no autonomy' to 'too much autonomy or judicial activism'. A balanced and coherent approach, one that upholds the law and constitution supreme, has largely been missing. For the earlier part of Pakistan's history, we see that the judiciary has remained non-autonomous and influenced by various state institutions. For the latter part of history, it took on a more dominant role when it partook in widespread judicial activism, which many blame for having caused political and economic ramifications for the country. One of the most contentious cases of judicial activism in Pakistan was the disqualification of the prime minister based on evidence gathered by a Joint Investigation Team formed by the court. The disqualification triggered political instability and turbulence, with the opposition claiming that the judiciary had taken a partisan stance in politics. This image of the Judiciary as a political player has eroded public's faith in its capacity to serve as a dispassionate mediator. This is one example of how judicial activism has caused political disruption. Pakistan has faced a crisis of governance since its inception. The main reason is the non-autonomous working of various state institutions, weak institutional structure as well as the abuse of power. If Pakistan is to embark upon a journey of democratic strengthening and efficient governance, the judiciary needs to play a more neutral role by ensuring that it works to hold only the law and constitution supreme. The judiciary is an integral part of any country's administration as it has the apex power to interpret laws and disseminate justice as well as uphold human rights. If the judiciary becomes contaminated, the country is bound to fall into the pit of anarchy and chaos. Therefore, judicial integrity and independence must be given top priority whereas the judiciary needs to make sure that it works with a more balanced approach instead of resorting to the two extremes of judicial activism and overdependence on non-judicial institutions.

As the Covid-19 pandemic burns through us, our world is passing through a portal. We have journeyed to a place from which it looks unlikely that we can return, at least not without some kind of serious rupture from the past social, political, economic and ideological. Corona virus has brought with it another, more terrible understanding of Azadi: the Free virus that has made nonsense of international borders, incarcerated whole populations and brought the modern world to a halt like nothing else ever could. It casts a different light on the lives we have lived so far. It forces us to question the values we have built modern societies on – what we have chosen to worship and what to cast aside. As we pass through this portal into another kind of world, we will have to ask ourselves what we want to take with us and what we will leave behind. We may not always have a choice – but not thinking about it will not be an option. And in order to think about it, we need an even deeper understanding of the world gone by, of the devastation we have caused to our planet and the deep injustice between fellow human beings that we have come to accept.

Have you ever felt like you don't know where you're going, or if you're making any progress at all in your career or your life? If so, you were most likely having an 'existential moment.' Existentialism is a philosophical and literary perspective that focuses on the experience of an individual person and the way that he or she understands the world.

After World War II, some philosophers and writers saw the world as an indifferent place without a set of universal rules that applied to everyone. In light of the large number of casualties, the Holocaust and the use of the first atomic bomb, post-war writers in particular found societal rules and views especially unreliable.

Q.4. Supply a title for the following passage, and express the substance clearly and accurately in not more than a third of the original length.

Part 1

A repugnance toward life has its physical and moral origins. We shall leave the explanation of the former to the doctor, of the latter to the moralist, and, in material that has been worked over again and again, let us pay attention to the salient point where this phenomenon expresses itself most clearly. All one's gratifications in life are based on the regular reappearance of external things. The change from day to night, of the seasons, of flower and fruit, and all the other things that confront us at regular intervals so that we may and should enjoy them — these are the actual wellsprings of our daily life. The more openly we avow these pleasures, the happier we are. But if these diverse spectacles revolve in front of us and we take no part in them, then we are unreceptive to these precious gifts; then the greatest evil, the most dire sickness breaks out in us — we look upon life as a repulsive burden. There is the story of an Englishman who hanged himself because he didn't want to dress and undress himself any more. I knew a gardener, a stalwart fellow in charge of a big park, who in his bleakness cried out one day, "Am I to spend my whole life watching the rain clouds move from eve to morn?" And then I have heard tell of one of our best men that he hates to see the greening of springtime and wishes that, for a change, everything would come up red! All these are symptoms of a weariness of life that quite often culminates in suicide and is more prevalent among thoughtful introverts than one would care to believe.

Q4. Supply a title for the following passage, and express the substance clearly and accurately in not more than a third of the original length. (30)

We call a man irrational when he acts in passion—when he cuts off his nose to spite his face. He is irrational because he forgets that by indulging the desire that he happens to feel most strongly about at the moment, he will thwart other desires which, in the long run, are more important to him. If men were rational, they would take a more correct view of their own interest than they do at present; and if all men acted from enlightened self-interest, the world would be a paradise in comparison with what it is now. I do not maintain that there is nothing better than self-interest as a motive to action; but I do maintain that self-interest, like altruism, is better when it is enlightened than when it is unenlightened. In an ordered community it is very rarely to a man's interest to do anything which is harmful to others. The less rational a man is, more often he will fail to perceive how what injures others would also injure him, because hatred or envy will blind him. Therefore, although I do not pretend that enlightened self-interest is the highest morality, I do maintain that, if it became common, it would make the world an immeasurably better place. Rationality, in practice, may be defined as the habit of remembering all our relevant desires, and not only the one that happens at the moment to be strongest. Like rationality in my opinion, it is a matter of degree. Complete rationality is no doubt an unattainable ideal, but so long as we continue to classify some men as lunatics it is clear that we think some men more rational than others. I believe that all solid progress in the world consists of an increase in rationality, both practiced and theoretical. (301)

Q4. Supply a title for the following passage, and express the substance clearly and accurately in not more than a third of the present length. (30)

Woodrow Wilson was referring "to the liberal idea of the economic market" when he said that the free enterprise system is the most efficient economic system. Maximum freedom means maximum productiveness; our 'openness' is to be the measure of our stability. Fascination with this ideal has made Americans defy the 'Old World' categories of settled possessiveness versus unsettling deprivation, the cupidity of retention versus the cupidity of seizure, a 'status quo' defended or attacked. The United States, it was believed, had no status quo ante. Our only 'station' was the turning of a stationary wheel, spinning faster and faster. We did not base our system on property but opportunity—which meant we based it not on stability but on mobility. The more things change, that is, the more rapidly the wheel turned, and the steadier we would be. The conventional picture of class politics is composed of the 'haves', who want stability to keep what they have, and the 'have-not', who want a touch of instability and change in which to scramble for the things they do not have. But Americans imagined a condition in which speculators, self-makers, runners are always using the new opportunities given by our land. These economic leaders (front-runners), would, thus, be mainly agents of change. Non-starters were considered the ones who wanted stability, a strong referee to give them some position in the race, a regulative hand to calm manic speculation, and authority that can call things to a halt, begin things again and form compensatory staggered 'starting lines'. “Tappa” or “Misra” or “Landai” is perhaps the oldest form of the Pashto poetry. It represents the culture and civilization of Pashtoon more than any other kind of Pashto poetry. It illustrates the true nature of a Pashtoon. In “Tappa” we find description of the virtues of ideal manhood, honour, bravery and justice, which are found in every Pashtoon, and Prof. Dawar Khan Dawood has said correctly that: If “Tappas” are readout to a foreigner critics, he will easily write the history of Pashtoon on the basis of the contents of “Tappas”.

One acute indication of how crucially the tensions, inequalities, and injustices of the home or metropolitan society where refracted and elaborated in the imperial culture is given by the distinguished conservative historian of an empire, D.K. Fieldhouse: 'The basis of Imperial authority,' he says, 'was the mental attitude of the colonist. His acceptance of subordination- whether through a positive sense of common interest with the parent state, or through inability to conceive of any alternative -made empire durable.' Fieldhouse was discussing white colonists in the Americas. But his general point goes beyond that: the durability of empire was sustained on both sides, but that of the rulers and that of the distant ruled, and in turn each had a set of interpretations of their common history with its own perspective, historical sense, emotional, and traditions. What an Algerian intellectual today remembers of his country's colonial past focuses severely on such events as France's military attacks on villages and the torture of prisoners during the war of liberation, on the exaltation over independence in 1962; for his French counterpart, who may have taken part in Algerian affairs or whose family lived in Algeria, there is chagrin at having 'lost' Algeria, a more positive attitude toward the French colonizing mission - with its schools, nicely planned cities, pleasant life - and perhaps even a sense that 'trouble commas' and communists disturbed the idyllic relationship between 'us' and 'them'. (Edward Said) (233).
